Henry Slayton ought to pay the cigars. This is why. Charles Burt's four-mule freight team was here Friday. So was Neil McMahon, and Messrs. McMahon, Slayton and Webster were talking "electric road" at Slayton's store, near where the four his left arm was broken; the same mules were browsing. Webster said electrics would soon be succeeded by some other device for rapid transit, and that even now Charles Burt had a "horseless wagon" that was a decided success. Henry's interest was immediately aroused, and he quickly remarked "Is that so; what motive Hyde Pond; but an innocent board power does he use?," when Ned with a nail in it fell from overhead soberly responded, "Mule power."
